Kites filled the blue air over Jaipur. Red and green and blue, they flew and spun and dipped in the clear winter air. The girl stood on the rooftop and looked with wide eyes. She wanted to send up a kite more than anything. But she did not own one.

Dadaji sat near the wall, smiling at all the kites. He held up a thin sheet of paper and two bamboo sticks. "We can make one," he said. "I can show you the instructions. Pay close attention and follow each step." She felt a rush of joy.

"Step one," said Dadaji. "Lay the sticks in a cross shape. Tie them at this section — that is the frame." With strong concentration, the girl tied the sticks. Her fingers moved in a slow, careful direction. "Perfect!" said Dadaji. "Now pass the string around each point."

"Step two," said Dadaji. "Lay the paper flat on the frame. Fold each section over the string and press it down." The girl worked fast. But the paper slipped. There was a rip — a long split ran right through the kite. Her heart sank.

The girl crumpled the torn paper in her hands. "I am full of frustration!" she said. "I give up!" Dadaji did not rush. He sat still and waited. "Do you want to stop?" he said in a soft voice. "We are not done yet."

The girl took a long breath and tried again. "Slow action this time," said Dadaji. "Press each section flat before you move on. Work in one direction only." She worked with great care. She pressed. She smoothed. She waited. The paper held. "It is working!" she cried.

At last, the kite was done. "Look at the shape we made!" she cried. Dadaji tied the string to the centre. "Now for the action!" he said. "Run in that direction and let the wind take it!" She ran with all her might and let the string out.

The kite shot up into the pure blue air. It flew higher and higher! "Woh Kata!" cheered the people on the next rooftop. Dadaji clapped his hands with joy. The girl looked at her kite spin and dance over the pink town. "Pure joy!" she cried. "Pure joy!"
