The Lantern Festival had filled the river park with golden light. Hundreds of glowing lanterns drifted above the Li River, and the karst mountains rose like dark peaks behind the city. The girl was watching a paper lantern float upwards when she noticed something terrible. A small boy sat alone on a stone step, clutching a stuffed panda, with tears on his face. The people all around him walked past as if he were invisible. She stopped.

She crouched down beside the boy and spoke to him in a gentle voice. He was perhaps three years old, and he looked absolutely miserable — his face red, his eyes wide, his small hands gripping the panda. "Where is your family?" she asked, but he could only shake his head and sob. It was clear he was not capable of finding them alone. She looked around at the crowds flowing past, and she made a decision: she was responsible for helping him, and it was possible to do it.

She pulled a small notebook from her jacket pocket and thought for a moment. Then she wrote a careful note in neat, readable handwriting and tore it out. The note said: "Lost child — dark jacket, green buttons, age 3. He is by the red lantern at the bridge. His family is searching for him. If you have seen them, please come at once." She held it up as high as she could. It was a sensible and responsible plan.

She took the boy's hand and walked towards the busy lantern stalls. An elderly woman selling tangyuan shook her head when she saw the note, but pointed further along the riverbank towards the bridge. A group of young people gathered, read the note and looked around — but nobody recognised the child. Each person was willing, but none were able to help. She did not give up. Giving up was not a reasonable or responsible option.

Near the entrance of the park, she spotted a security guard in a yellow jacket. She walked straight up to him, held out the note and said clearly, "This child is lost. He has been here for some time." The guard read the note carefully, nodded and spoke into his radio. He asked her to stay in one comfortable spot beside the red lantern at the bridge. She sat with the boy and told him a quiet story about the panda in his arms. He stopped crying and leaned against her shoulder.

While they waited, she bought the boy a warm roasted sweet potato from a nearby cart. His face changed — from miserable and terrified, to curious, to something almost cheerful. He held the sweet potato in both hands and looked up at her. "Panda," he said, and held the toy out to her. It was an adorable thing to do, and she understood it at once — he was sharing his most valuable possession with her. She held it carefully, and for the first time that evening, he smiled.

The guard came running back with a woman and a man following close behind. The little boy looked up — and in less than a second, his face went from frightened to overjoyed. "Mama!" he cried, and the woman rushed forward and scooped him up, clutching him in an incredible, tearful hug. The man gripped the guard's hand and then looked at the girl with a grateful and disbelieving expression. She stood a little way back, watching the most remarkable reunion she had ever seen, with something warm and steady building inside her.

The mother turned to the girl, still holding her son tightly. "You kept him safe," she said, and her voice was not quite steady. "You stayed. You helped." She paused for a moment, and then she said something the girl would always remember. "You are remarkable." The girl walked back through the incredible festival, past the glowing lanterns and the karst mountains rising in the dark. She thought about what it meant to be capable, and she thought it was quite simple: when something terrible is visible, a responsible person does not walk past.
